Prejudice on campus

In many different academic disciplines, dealing with social prejudice is an area of research that is both well established and also most up-to-date. While detailed analyses have been established under the aspect of social prejudice for some groups, students as a social group, in particular among international comparisons, have been treated rather marginally so far despite both universities and students themselves clearly calling attention to this problematic situation. Although there is a consensus that a higher educational level coincides with less social prejudice, new studies have also come to the conclusion that this assumption needs further differentiated analysis.

One major target of this conference is to organize an academic exchange on social prejudice at universities from an inter-disciplinary, internationally comparative perspective on one hand (what do we know?). On the other hand the conference intends to analyse both the potential risks and opportunities that might result from the current discourse on social prejudice on campus (what do we need?) and to include students.
